Dayton’s Bluff District 4 Community Council
Annual meeting, potluck and board of directors election

Members of the community met on the evening of October 18 for the Dayton’s Bluff council’s annual meeting and potluck. St. Paul City Council President Kathy Lantry gave a “State of Dayton’s Bluff” address, highlighting City Pages’ designation of Dayton’s Bluff as the “best undiscovered neighborhood—2010.” She pointed out how, in addition to its other unique features, “Dayton’s Bluff transforms people who get here.”

Election results for the council board, (half of the seats are up for reelection each year) were announced at the meeting. New members are Giovanna Salerno, Daniel Stabiley, Cheryl Kenney, Richard Bold, and Tabitha Benci DeRango. Returning members are Jean Comstock, Jacob Dorer, Chris New- ton and Avinash Viswanathan. They will be joining current board members Roy Carlson, Sage Holben, Sharon McCrea, Nell Powers-Graham, Colin Wilkinson, Carla Riehle, Paul Sawyer and Alan Swearingen.

Dayton’s Bluff Community Banquet
by Ed Lambert
District council executive director

The Dayton’s Bluff District 4 Community Council is inviting all residents and businesses to the second Annual Community Recognition Banquet. The event will be held on Friday, November 12, at Our Sa- viour’s Lutheran Church at 674 John- son Parkway. This family-friendly gathering is a fun and easy way to connect with neighbors and catch up on what’s happening in Dayton’s Bluff.

Last year’s gathering, in May, was attended by nearly 150 adults and young people and presented awards to two individuals and a long time community service organization for their valued contributions to our community’s health and well being.

This year’s banquet will have a catered meal from the popular Yaruss’s Italian restaurant located on Payne Avenue. The buffet style meal will be served at 6:30 pm, and will include remarkable, varied, and delicious “community desserts” pre- pared by some 10-15 volunteers.

Distracted parenting takes its toll on families, community
By Meg Gronau

It's Tuesday. 8:36 pm and the kids are, blessedly, already sleeping. As I write this article on a computer in our kitchen, my husband is in the living room indulging in his medium of choice: the TV. It's the first time this week that hubby and I have been (essentially) alone together in the house at the same time, but are we engaging in conversation? Playing cards with each other? Solving the world’s problems? No. The only sounds are the tippy-tap of my fingers on the keyboard, and the drone of whatever show he's watching. We're both engrossed in our respective blue lights. It's how we wind down, we say. And I have a deadline I’m working on. An-n-n-n-d the kids required a particularly large amount of energy this evening. We’re tired, sure, but it’s also true that our relationship is a bit . . . distracted.

This happens while the kids are awake, too. “I just have to check one quick email,” I say . . . and proceed to while away 30 more minutes on the computer. Or my sister calls, and we talk for 20 minutes while the kids whine and hang from my elbows. Much has been made, lately, of “distracted parenting”: multitasking on electronic gadgets (smart phones, BlackBerries, iPhones) while we’re supposed to be minding our children. StarTribune.com has a few recent articles and blogs on the subject. Sherry Turkle from MIT has written several books and articles on humans’ interactions with technology, emphasizing the point that mobile devices degrade our sense of community. The consensus seems to be: everything in moderation. Make time to be together with no distractions. But this is not a new thing. The phrase “quality time” been around for at least 30 years. My parents used to mock the idea that you could schedule or somehow plan for those simple moments that make family memories. The best way to have quality time is just to do it. Put down the phone; walk away from the computer. Not plugged in? Put the Sudoku away; recycle those magazines. But it’s not always so easy. We tell ourselves we’re “expert multitaskers” because we have so much practice—haha! And yet there is recent research on the human brain, revealing there is no such thing as “multitasking:” we’re simply not doing ANYTHING well.

Rosie Johnsen – Obb’s Sports Bar

Rosie Johnsen of Obb’s Sports Bar and Grill at 1347 Burns Avenue was recently inducted into the Hopsy Hall of Fame at the annual Expo of the Minnesota Licensed Beverage Association (MLBA). She is one of the first women to receive this honor, which is given annually to people who have a “lifetime of achievement” in Minnesota’s hospitality industry. Rosie was married to Bob Johnsen, one of the sons of Albert “Obb” Johnsen, who started the local landmark many years ago.

Bob and his brother took over for their father after he retired and that’s where Rosie’s story takes off. It all started out over five decades ago when Rosie received a frantic call from her sister-in-law who was working a huge crowd at the restaurant and needed help. Although reluctant, Rosie, who was living two houses away, complied and is still working there after more than 50 years.

“I came down and never got out of here,” she said. “How I ever found time to have five more children, I don’t know.” She was thinking about retiring when she was in her 70s, but “little did I know my son was going to get the business back, so here I am.”

Rosie, now 89 years old, still works almost every day at Obbs, usually around lunch time. In fact, the night she received the award, Rosie had worked several hours at the restaurant’s annual booya and currently has no plans to retire.

Tales of Hoffman and Watch the Glow

by Karin DuPaul
Dayton’s Bluff Community Organizer

Friends of Swede Hollow (FOSH) hosted the “Tales of Hoffman” operetta in Swede Hollow Park on September 18. The weather was great and the operetta was delightful. Around 75 people attended the performance. The audience sat on lawn chairs and some sat on blankets near Swede Hollow Henge, as they watched the performance with a hawk soaring overhead.

During the performance, actors passed out finger foods to the audience. Performances are generally done in community gardens and parks.

The production was put on by Mixed Precipitation, a performance initiative exploring text, space and new dramatic forms. They present entertaining, high-quality events that highlight social engagement and provide opportunities for artists to work across disciplines. Earlier this summer Ronni Slowiak, Karin DuPaul and Scotty Reynolds, the executive director, toured Swede Hollow Park and Scotty decided that it would be a great place for a performance.

FOSH is looking forward to having the group back next year when Wagner’s “Ring Cycle” is presented in melodramatic installments. After “Tales of Hoffman” many people including former Swede Hollow residents and Hamm’s Brewery employees attended the annual “Watch the Glow of the Setting Sun on the Red Brick Brewery” event that followed. Meeting at Swede Hollow Henge in the park near the Drewry Lane and Beaumont entrance, visitors chatted and exchanged stories as they waited for the sun to set and the bright glow of the brewery building. And once again the sun brightly glowed on the side of the red brick brewery. After the sun set, the evening cookout and socializing began. More memories were shared of the good old days living in the Hollow and working in the brewery. Once again Joe Sanchelli and his daughter Nancy entertained everyone with Italian songs. Folks sat around the camp fires and chatted about everything from buying a house to FOSH’s next projects.

FOSH is a nonprofit organization that works on Swede Hollow issues, plantings, cleanups, education, history tours, and events. Their monthly meetings are on the last Wednesday of each month generally at Water and Oil Gallery. New members are welcome. For more information email SwedeHollow@gmail.com or call 651-776-0550.

Have a candidate for the Neighborhood Honor Roll?

The St. Paul Neighborhood Honor Roll, started in the 1980s, consists of St. Paul residents who have done outstanding service in their neighborhoods over a long period of time. Every year, each of the 17 district councils may add three names to the honor roll. The St. Paul Neighborhood Honor Roll is located in the hallway on the third floor of City Hall.

Past honor roll inductees have contributed a variety of services and included church and school volunteers, members of community council boards of directors, block club leaders and leaders of projects like back-thorn removal or community events.

Last year the Dayton’s Bluff District 4 Community Council added Stephanie Harr, Mary Ann Cogelow, and Maryann Chowen for their years of service in the Dayton’s Bluff neighborhood.

The council is looking for three people in Dayton’s Bluff to add to the honor roll this year. If you know of someone who has done an outstanding job of volunteer work in our neighborhood, contact information is below.

Metropolitan State University holds immigration forum: “SB1070, Race and the National Conversation on Immigration”

by Carla Riehle, Forum editor

Much in the news today, this topic drew some 125 people to a noontime forum at Metropolitan State University on October 6.

The meeting focused on the controversial Arizona law, SB1070, which gives local law enforcement new authority with respect to immigration law. The panel discussion addressed the historical, political, racial, and policy ramifications of the law, which has triggered a national conversation on immigrants (especially from Mexico), and the role of the state and law enforcement in immigration control.

The panelists, an attorney from Arizona, two University of Minnesota professors and the director of Waite House in Minneapolis, were all critical of the effects and intentions of SB1070.

Although some of the most far-reaching parts of the law have been prevented by an appeals court from going into effect, some parts are still being enforced, such as the provisions criminalizing transporting and harboring immigrants and those that particularly focus on day laborers. Bustamante pointed out that 11 Latin American nations had filed friend of the court papers asking that the law be thrown out because of their view that the law discriminates against their citizens.

Erika Lee, from the University of Minnesota, herself a descendent of Chinese immigrants, drew parallels between the Asian exclusion laws of the early 20th century and the current reaction against Latino immigrants. Chinese immigrants were stereotyped and arguments similar to today were made about issues of citizenship by birthright. Katherine Fennelly, from the Humphrey Institute at the University of Minnesota, pointed out the ways in which U.S. policy has actually encouraged and encouraged Mexican immigration to the U.S. While trade policy has encouraged U.S. ownership in Mexico – with Walmart being the largest employer, and U.S. Bank, the largest bank, leading to small farmers and business owners thrown out of work – there has been no change in U.S. immigration law to accommodate the new unemployed. She said that while it’s suggested that such immigrants should get in line, there is, in reality, no line for them to join. Of the immigrant visas offered to Mexican workers, only one percent is for blue collar workers.

Francisco Segovia, from Waite House in Minneapolis, said that he came to the U.S., from El Salvador fleeing its civil war, but is still unable to obtain papers making him a legal immigrant.

He also pointed out that while then-candidate Obama never used the word “illegal” to apply to immigrants, and President Jimmy Carter actually removed the word from federal documents, the term is now back in full force – for example, the new health care bill is replete with its use. The incongruity, he said, is that undocumented immigrants are not “illegal” because federal law does not criminalize this behavior. What states like Arizona are doing is attempting to change that, and in Minnesota, there is a bill modeled on the Arizona legislation, HF 3830, that does the same thing.

He urged that the “I-word” be dropped, and that the discussion on immigration needs be taken into the churches and other community organizations, and that we need to begin to see it as a civil and human rights issue.
More on Dayton’s Bluff in the post World War II Era

by Steve Trimble

This will be the third look at our neighborhood in the post WW II era. It is also a preview of the major article that I will have in Ramsey County History magazine that will be available in November. There will be items that have not been included in the Forum. It will have information on the Payne Avenue and Arcade Street communities as well during the 1940s and 50s. You can buy a copy of it or read it in any St. Paul or Ramsey County library. Of course, if you have personal and family stories about Dayton’s Bluff in the late 1940s or 1950s, please contact us.

Teens thought to be troublesome

In those years, movies like “Blackboard Jungle” fed into the belief that teenagers, often left unattended during the war years, were increasingly troublesome. The city unveiled a new plan “to combat juvenile delinquency” and to prevent the formation of groups “which spend their leisure time in rowdying and activities that are potentially dangerous.” There was going to be a new youth worker at the Bluff playground. There would be dramatics and crafts for the girls. The Bluff playground, among others, tried to keep youngsters occupied with positive pursuits. Besides an area for games, it had a workshop where many a boy made a bowling pin lamp for his home.

The girls were kept busy with a basketball team, and a chorus as well as tap dance and baton twirling groups. There were also dances. According to a woman who attended them, “For the guys it was a place to stand against the wall and eventually work up the courage to ask a girl to dance,” she recalled. “For the girls, it was fun to show off those special new blouses, skirts and saddle shoes, dance to the ‘fast ones,’ and whisper amongst themselves about which boys they hoped would ask them to dance the ‘slow ones.’”

New local institutions

There were some new responses to changing times that brought about the creation of some new local institutions. Sixty concerned East Side parents who wanted more youth activities turned out at a 1955 meeting and decided to start Parkway Little League, a baseball organization. On June 6 that year the first ball was pitched to a young batter and the group, located in Dayton’s Bluff, was launched. About 200 boys took part during the season, using temporary fields. The next year, the group conducted a door-to-door fundraising effort and bought three lots on 3rd Street and two fields were graded with the support of local businesses.

Churches continue their work

Churches continued to be important neighborhood institutions, serving the spiritual and many of the social needs of families. They needed to adapt to an aging community or chose to move away. In Dayton’s Bluff, Sacred Heart remained and even dedicated a new edifice in 1951. Like other congregations, its numbers dwindled and some members drove in to services from the newer areas of the city. One of its 1956 publications affirmed the predominantly working class nature of the neighborhood.

“For the most part,” it said: “Our parishioners belong to the wage earning class of people—factory workers, laborers, tradesmen, office clerks, food processors, bankers, small businessmen, and a sprinkling of professional; namely, nurses, teachers, doctors—each and all earning their bread by the sweat of their brow as the Lord ordained.”

Peace United Church made a commitment to remain in Dayton’s Bluff, even though many felt the surrounding area was becoming undesirable. Although the church membership was beginning to taper off, they added a new Christian education wing in 1955. They also maintained their church softball team as well as volleyball and bowling teams. The determination to stay in spite of concerns may well have expressed the attitudes of many area residents. “We are surrounded by a declining neighborhood, industrial factories, taverns, a high degree of vandalism and theft and a ‘no parking’ situation,” a church publication commented. Some people wondered why they didn’t move to a “better” location. The church’s response “included a number of reasons involving mission and commitment to the community . . . and the interrelatedness of our people, with pride of heritage.”

Demographics change

The demographics of Dayton’s Bluff were shifting. The population started dropping significantly in the 1940s and began aging as children moved away. Many of the younger residents went into new starter homes built on undeveloped land inside the city or in the nearby expanding suburbs and often financed by the G.I. Bill. As automobile ownership increased, the local business community was affected. Increasingly, people would jump into their cars to go to one of the outlying shopping areas rather than make purchases in the local community.

The 1940s and 1950s had been a good time for the residents. Prosperity would continue for a time, even as the neighborhoods had to use their well-known resilience to struggle with a deteriorating housing stock, and the growth of absentee landlords and the flight to the suburbs. The community would soon be impacted by “de-industrialization” as major employers shut down or moved away and the jobs that had allowed the blue collar families to prosper would slowly disappear.

Steve Trimble researches and writes about local history.

Now Filming: Vento Sanctuary Audio-Video Tour
Sarah Clark, Lower Phalen Creek Project

Take note local history buffs, bird watchers and amateur geologists: you will soon have a new resource for exploring the Bruce Vento Nature Sanctuary!

The Lower Phalen Creek Project, sponsored by the East Side Neighborhood Development Company, is currently filming an audio-video tour of the sanctuary. The tour captures expert guides talking about the sanctuary's many ecological and cultural resources. John Anfinson of the National Park Service will share information on the site's rail, brewing and geologic history. Former Audubon Mississippi River Program Director Dan McGuinness offers an expert analysis of the land's value as a key stop on the Mississippi River flyway. Sue Vento provides an introduction, and St. Paul Parks staff describe ecological restoration. In all there will be nine stops in this half-hour tour.

The tour will be available free for downloading and viewing on your computer at home, or on your iPhone or other hand-held device while out in the sanctuary. An audio-only version will also be available.

In addition to featuring our own nationally-acknowledged city park, the tour utilizes home grown talent. Videographer Tony Andrea of East End Productions brings technical skill to the project as well as a passion for our community. A native of St. Paul's East Side, Tony's roots in Dayton's Bluff date back to the mid-1800s when his Greek and Italian ancestors settled here.

Visit the Lower Phalen Creek Project website (www.phalenecreek.org) to find project updates — and the final product, which should be available for free downloading in early 2011. Funding for this project is provided through a grant from the Arts and Culture Heritage Fund established through the vote of Minnesotans on November 4, 2008, and administered by the Minnesota Historical Society.

Dayton’s Bluff featured on TV

Twin Cities Public Television, with funding from the Bigelow Foundation, completed two half-hour documentaries about the East Side of St. Paul last month.

Dayton’s Bluff residents, organizations, businesses and others who work there are among the East Siders describing their community’s history and assets.

Working with a wide range of organizations coordinated by the East Side Social Leaders Action Network (ESLAN), the documentaries focus on East Side pride and community building.

The photos accompanying this article were taken at the premiere of the documentaries held at Metropolitan State University on September 24. Some 95 people came to the event to view both documentaries, and hear from the producers and others involved in creating them. Last month, on Sunday, October 17, both were broadcast on TPT-Minnesota (channel 243 on Comcast cable). They are now in the rotation schedule for TPT and will be aired separately multiple times over the next two to three years, with statewide airings as well.

ESLAN is setting up a website later this year, with links to a wide variety of East Side organizations as part of its effort to promote positive information and images of St. Paul’s East Side. The site will enable visitors to view the videos, as well as assist East Side organizations get access to that portion of the TPT footage not used in the documentaries.

The launching of www.eastsidestp.org is expected before the end of 2010.

For more information on ESLAN and the documentary project, contact Ed Lambert, ed@daytonsbluff.org, or Betsy Leach, district1council@comcast.net.

SOA Watch annual trip to Fort Benning, Georgia by Wayne Wittman

On November 16, 1989, at the University of Central America in San Salvador, six Jesuit priests, their cook and her daughter were brutally killed by elements of the El Salvador army. Subsequent investigations linked many of the officers involved in this atrocity, as well as many others that occurred in Latin America, to the School of the Americas (SOA) then located at Fort Benning in Columbus, Georgia. Efforts were initiated by Latin American human rights activists to call attention to the school and call for it to be closed. Since 1995, rallies have been held around the November 16th date as people from all parts of the world have gathered in Columbus for the commemoration.

Several years ago, the SOA was closed but reopened soon after under the name Western Hemisphere Institute of Security Cooperation, now called WHINSEC. Human rights advocates maintain that the name change meant nothing, as the function of the school in training repressive forces in Latin America remains the same, and they call for it to be permanently closed.

The Peace and Justice Committee of Sacred Heart Church has been active in the support of the vigil. Francie Carr, Joan Bergman, Art Marty (now deceased) and Wayne Wittman have taken many Veterans For Peace bus trips to the rally over the years.

The bus trip leaves on Friday morning, travels all night and gets to Columbus, Georgia Saturday morning. Arrangements are made for hotel accommodations in Columbus. Participants attend many spiritual, educational and social events on Saturday afternoon and evening. On Sunday there is a funeral procession honoring some of the known victims of the military atrocities committed by the soldiers trained at the SOA.

The program usually ends late Sunday afternoon and bus riders return to their bus, spend the night on the bus and get home Monday evening.

This year the Veterans For Peace bus leaves from Saint Stephen's parking lot in Minneapolis at 8:00 am Friday, November 19, and returns on Monday, November 22.

The cost is $200.00 for the bus and the hotel room is $100.00, but efforts are made to arrange room sharing for up to four to a room.

Persons who wish to know more about the program can contact Joan Bergman at 651-774-0595 or Francie Carr at 651-772-4513 for information.

For trip information, contact Wayne Wittman at 651-774-4008.

SOA Watch annual trip to Fort Benning, Georgia by Wayne Wittman

On November 16, 1989, at the University of Central America in San Salvador, six Jesuit priests, their cook and her daughter were brutally killed by elements of the El Salvador army. Subsequent investigations linked many of the officers involved in this atrocity, as well as many others that occurred in Latin America, to the School of the Americas (SOA) then located at Fort Benning in Columbus, Georgia. Efforts were initiated by Latin American human rights activists to call attention to the school and call for it to be closed. Since 1995, rallies have been held around the November 16th date as people from all parts of the world have gathered in Columbus for the commemoration.

Several years ago, the SOA was closed but reopened soon after under the name Western Hemisphere Institute of Security Cooperation, now called WHINSEC. Human rights advocates maintain that the name change meant nothing, as the function of the school in training repressive forces in Latin America remains the same, and they call for it to be permanently closed.

The Peace and Justice Committee of Sacred Heart Church has been active in the support of the vigil. Francie Carr, Joan Bergman, Art Marty (now deceased) and Wayne Wittman have taken many Veterans For Peace bus trips to the rally over the years.

The bus trip leaves on Friday morning, travels all night and gets to Columbus, Georgia Saturday morning. Arrangements are made for hotel accommodations in Columbus. Participants attend many spiritual, educational and social events on Saturday afternoon and evening. On Sunday there is a funeral procession honoring some of the known victims of the military atrocities committed by the soldiers trained at the SOA.

The program usually ends late Sunday afternoon and bus riders return to their bus, spend the night on the bus and get home Monday evening.
